What's A Glucose Strip and How It Works

At its most basic, a glucose test strip is a device that measures the amount of glucose in your blood. They are small plastic strips that contain a chemical called glucose oxidase, which reacts with the glucose in your blood and produces hydrogen peroxide. The amount of hydrogen peroxide produced is proportional to the amount of glucose present. It's used by people with diabetes to monitor how much sugar is present in their bodies and whether they are staying within an acceptable range.

How Glucose Test Strips Work?

Glucose test strips work by measuring the change in electrical charge when blood comes into contact with the strip's active area. When you put a drop of blood on a glucose test strip, it reacts with enzymes on the strip that cause the glucose level to change its electrical charge. This causes an electrode on the back of the test strip to produce a current that is then measured and read by your meter as your blood sugar level.

How glucose test strips help diabetic patients?

Glucose strips are one of the most important things you can have in your diabetic toolkit.

They're also one of the most under-utilized.

The reason for this is simple: they're not fun to use, and they don't offer much visual feedback. That's right—you can't see what your glucose is unless you check it on a machine, and even then, it doesn't tell you much more than "Wow, that number is high!" or "Wow, that number is low!"

But glucose test strips are so much more than just numbers. They're a way to stay connected with your body and make sure that the diabetes management plan you've built together with your doctor is working for you.

However, it's important not to rely solely on glucose test strips because they aren't always accurate. If you have any doubts about your results from one of these tests, it's best to talk with your doctor about them so that he or she can run another sample through their own sophisticated equipment.
